The first chapter outlines the need for a new historiographical paradigm that supersedes the modern conception of universal history by rearticulating history as a plurality of historical temporalities interwoven and in friction with each other. This pluralization of historical temporalities responds to the present need to understand and intervene in a globalized world, a need that involves, beside provincializing Europe, overcoming the provincialism of time, which imposes the linear ...

Chapter 1. Getting started with data. Scientists seek to answer questions using rigorous methods and careful observations. These observations – collected from the likes of field notes, surveys, and experiments – form the backbone of a statistical investigation and are called data. Statistics is the study of how best to collect, analyze, and draw conclusions from data, and in this first chapter, we focus on both the properties of data and on the collection of data.
